On 11 September 2007, I left Kenya to pursue doctoral studies in the Netherlands after my employer, the University of Nairobi, graciously accepted to grant me study leave, renewable yearly on condition of a satisfactory yearly report. They renewed my leave every year until the completion of my studies; for this, I am very grateful. During my stay in the Netherlands, I met many people who have positively impacted my academic life. Others even went to the extent of opening their homes to me, while others genuinely made enquiries concerning my progress and accorded some form of assistance, all to make the last four years not just bearable but exceedingly fruitful and memorable.

I am very grateful to Professor Syed Mansoob Murshed and Professor Ton Dietz for agreeing to be my supervisors. They offered me much needed guidance, encouragement, stability and peace of mind in my studies. Apart from my supervisors, I am grateful to Dr. Admasu Shiferaw whose one-time advice re-shaped my research work and provided a much-needed turning point. I would like to thank the Africa Economic Research Consortium (AERC), who funded a research paper which formed an integral part of Chapter Six of this thesis. Through this network, I was able to meet Dr. Remco Oostendorp of the Free University of Amsterdam. His friendship, assistance in the AERC paper, and contribution to this thesis is invaluable. I have learnt a great deal from his excellent understanding of econometrics and dealing with firm-level data. It was also through him that I met his colleague Dr. Jacob Jordaan, who was also very helpful in my work. I would like to thank Professor Arjun Bedi, who at one time in the most difficult period in my study offered a shoulder to lean on and allowed me to cry out my frustration. Likewise, I would like to thank Dr. Marcel Rutten, who not only welcomed me to his Kenyan home but also offered very good guidance throughout my study. He also shared with me his library and gave many useful suggestions that have shaped my work.

I would also like to thank the Dutch ministry of foreign Affairs for funding the Tracking Development Project, the entire Tracking Development team and the Africa studies centre for their support while writing this dissertation. In addition, thank you to Kim de Vries for designing the maps used in this thesis. I would like to thank my parents and siblings, and friends especially from the Kahawa West Baptist Church, who kept praying for me throughout this period and always gave me encouraging words. My mother in particular kept urging me to press on. Finally, I thank everybody whom I did not mention by name but who was instrumental in making this dissertation a success.
